Rounding

Alexandre Y. Poppe, MDCM

(Round 1)

white coated angels swarm down the hammer they wield, a reaper's scythe and just as deliberate—foretelling death
in sleeping men

(Round 2)

he lies between exchanged cacophony —blaring horns and cars colliding—words muttered between white coats like foreign tongues: shriller than squealing tires sharper than broken glass

(Round 3)

follow the flow of fluids in one vein out the other in the mouth, out the bladder a placenta of tubes and wires and half-told lies to the old man in embryo disguise

(Round 4)

the words are in your eyes:
up for yes
down for no your arms and legs are locked lips and tongue are caught one moment to turn your head —to dissect your life away—do we chance your breaths without a tube?

you gaze firmly upwards, seeking the sky:
a searing eloquence that spoken words would have denied

(Round 5)

the man lies stilled and silenced by the bleeding in his brain and despite myself I inflict on him a second violence primum non nocere but I pry his eyes apart to shine in them a glaring light jolt his head from side to side thrust torn tissue onto his corneas flush ice water in his ears push and pull the tube that lets him breath exact a deep and deeper pain upon his limbs all to coax him from a twilight before the night —all in vain—
these are the ministrations we wish families not to see for there is a private shame in performing them and I can only pray that he is retreated to a place where he sees, speaks and moves without recourse to my vulgar provocations

(Round 6)

white coat down to my knees, they knock together with oscillatory ease it is my turn now to displease—succumb, dear man succumb to your disease
